Over a decade ago, the publication of Divided Houses ushered in a new field of scholarship on gender and the Civil War. Following in its wake, Battle Scars showcases insights from award-winning historians as well as emerging scholars. This volume depicts the ways in which gender, race, nationalism, religion, literary culture, sexual mores, and even epidemiology underwent radical transformations from when Americans went to war in 1861 through Reconstruction. Examining the interplay among such phenomena as racial stereotypes, sexual violence, trauma, and notions of masculinity, Battle Scars represents the best new scholarship on men and women in the North and South and highlights how lives were transformed by this era of tumultuous change.

"Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) and suicides are on the rise in our military. After more than a decade of war, a large number of our servicemen and women are returning home broken, some with physical scars, others with scars that are not as visible, but life-changing, nevertheless. More than 400,000 servicemen and women are suffering with battle scars of PTSD, major depression and combat-related stress; 320,000 suffer from traumatic brain injury. Treatment for mental health issues is challenging and a single treatment approach does not work for everyone. As a result, DOD has moved towards development of an integrative treatment plan, using alternative medicine to complement conventional medicine, for treating this type of mental health disorders. Reiki is a complementary health approach in which practitioners place their hands lightly on or just above a person, with the goal of facilitating the person's own healing response. It is based on an Eastern belief in an energy that supports the body's innate or natural healing abilities and has been studied for a variety of conditions, including pain, anxiety, fatigue, and depression. This paper analyzes how and why Reiki could be incorporated as a healing therapy within DOD as part of an integrated care program. There has been little high-quality research on Reiki. Case studies conclude the benefits of Reiki are unclear but no harmful side effects have been shown. This paper argues that though scientific evidence is lacking, the benefits derived are indisputable. Private hospitals have incorporated Reiki with significant success against symptoms similar to those experienced by PTSD sufferers and continue to search for additional ways to use it. Therefore, this paper recommends that DOD include Reiki as complementary therapy for an integrated treatment approach for PTSD and other wounded warrior issues."--Abstract.

Specifically focuses on the impact that an experience of domestic violence can have on the lives of survivors after separation from abusive relationship and onwards.

Ta-tinis: Martini toasting, cancer kicking chicks with souvenir ta-tas Meet the Ta-tinis: five young women who got together to talk about their ta-tas over martinis. For these outings, they leave behind their husbands, kids, and other friends who don't meet the condition of surviving cancer with a sassy attitude in order to find fun and comfort in each other. Kim, Brittany, Amy, Mandy, and Jessica became a support group for each other during their battles with this deadly disease. The Tas " were diagnosed within twenty months of each other between 2006 and 2007 and were between the ages of twenty-six and thirty-four. All lost their boobs to bilateral mastectomies and their hair to chemo. Cancer is an ugly disease, yet these women managed to find each other in their greatest time of need and emerge even more beautiful on the other side. In Forever in the Fight, the Ta-tinis tell the no-holds-barred emotional stories of how they overcame the most difficult challenge of their lives. Each woman describes how she learned the news of her diagnosis and how her life changed for the better throughout her cancer journey, despite the hardships she endured. Being diagnosed with breast cancer at such young ages left these women with many questions. They felt alienated in waiting rooms when they looked around and saw the faces of other breast cancer patients, all much older than they. Therefore, finding each other and being able to share in each other's uncertainty and triumphs is one of the unexpected blessings that resulted from their experiences. So how does one become a Ta-tini? Much like their signature drink, a Ta-tini is made of many things. one part steadfast faith one part fight infused with compassion a splash of fierce determination rimmed with humor garnished with vibrant spirit Many young women possess these ingredients " ; however, what truly makes a Ta-tini is the shaking! She is stripped of every defining feminine quality...her body is pricked, poked, squished, chopped, and mangled...she is CT'd, MRI'd, and PET'd. Her flesh is cooked under powerful radiation lamps. She is infused with toxic chemicals supplemented with countless drugs and painful shots. But with the right attitude, women can be poured from the cancer journey and emerge with grace and strength that they did not have before. Theirs is a radiance that can only be attributed to a second chance at life. The Ta-tinis are one fewer now, having lost Jessica in 2013. And yet, through everything, they share how they can still feel sexy and attractive with their battle scars and without their headlights. Today, they are activists in their communities, raising awareness for breast cancer survivors and especially for young women in the fight.

Emilie Davis was a free African American woman who lived in Philadelphia during the Civil War. She worked as a seamstress, attended the Institute for Colored Youth, and was an active member of her community. She lived an average life in her day, but what sets her apart is that she kept a diary. Her daily entries from 1863 to 1865 touch on the momentous and the mundane: she discusses her own and her community's reactions to events of the war, such as the Battle of Gettysburg, the Emancipation Proclamation, and the assassination of President Lincoln, as well as the minutiae of social life in Philadelphia's black community. Her diaries allow the reader to experience the Civil War in "real time" and are a counterpoint to more widely known diaries of the period. Judith Giesberg has written an accessible introduction, situating Davis and her diaries within the historical, cultural, and political context of wartime Philadelphia. In addition to furnishing a new window through which to view the war's major events, Davis's diaries give us a rare look at how the war was experienced as a part of everyday life—how its dramatic turns and lulls and its pervasive, agonizing uncertainty affected a northern city with a vibrant black community.

Civil War soldiers enjoyed unprecedented access to obscene materials of all sorts, including mass-produced erotic fiction, cartes de visite, playing cards, and stereographs. A perfect storm of antebellum legal, technological, and commercial developments, coupled with the concentration of men fed into armies, created a demand for, and a deluge of, pornography in the military camps. Illicit materials entered in haversacks, through the mail, or from sutlers; soldiers found pornography discarded on the ground, and civilians discovered it in abandoned camps. Though few examples survived the war, these materials raised sharp concerns among reformers and lawmakers, who launched campaigns to combat it. By the war's end, a victorious, resurgent American nation-state sought to assert its moral authority by redefining human relations of the most intimate sort, including the regulation of sex and reproduction—most evident in the Comstock laws, a federal law and a series of state measures outlawing pornography, contraception, and abortion. With this book, Judith Giesberg has written the first serious study of the erotica and pornography that nineteenth-century American soldiers read and shared and links them to the postwar reaction to pornography and to debates about the future of sex and marriage.

This unique book offers an innovative feminist critique of attachment theory that offers an alternative understanding of relationships between women and their babies in domestic violence. Fiona Buchanan identifies a way forward for working with women, babies and people who have grown up with domestic violence focusing on strengths not deficits. In doing so, she raises new possibilities for work with women and babies in other situations where trauma impacts on their relationships. In line with feminist traditions of listening to the voices of women, this book theorizes from research which asks women who birthed and mothered babies in domestic violence about their experiences. The research identifies that women respond with protectiveness when faced with sustained hostility from their partners and protected their babies in many ways not recognised by attachment theorists. However, sustained hostility often targets the growing relationship between women and their babies and limits space for the woman and baby to peacefully relate. This book offers deep insights and a new model for working with women, babies and those who have grown up with violence based on understanding the context of sustained hostility, appreciating women ' s protectiveness and expanding space where women and babies can relate. The author calls for practitioners across health and welfare settings to explore the situations in which women mother; women ' s protective thoughts feelings and actions and how they find space to relate. This is the ideal resource for researchers, policy makers and practitioners, as well as women and people who grew up with domestic violence.
